

Product Conversation Fundamentals

A short, fictional course for demonstrating the training portal.

1. Begin with discovery

A useful product conversation starts with the customer's desired outcome. Ask open questions about what they want to improve, why it matters, and how they measure success. Resist the urge to present every feature before you understand the goal.

Key idea: understand the customer's goal before proposing a capability.

2. Listen, clarify, and connect

Active listening is more than waiting to speak. Summarize the customer's concern in your own words and invite correction. Follow with a focused question when you need more context. This makes assumptions visible and helps both sides agree on the real need.

Once the need is clear, connect only the most relevant capability to it. A credible value statement explains how that capability supports the customer's stated outcome; it does not depend on jargon or a long feature list.

Key idea: summarize the concern, clarify it, then connect a relevant capability to the desired outcome.

3. Agree on the next step

Close by confirming the goals and decisions discussed. Then agree on a specific next action, the person responsible for it, and a date. A vague promise to follow up creates uncertainty; a shared commitment creates momentum.

Send a concise follow-up that records the agreed goals, decisions, owners, and dates. Do not introduce unsupported claims or bury the action beneath unrelated material.

Key idea: finish with a clear next step, owner, and date.
